THE DYING. Of bring me flowers, my dang,
And twine them on my hap.
The beautiful the foirest was.
And let thus, wither there.
The wild-rose and the fragile life.
The blossomrofa day:
And wreathe them on the brow of a
As perishing as they.

As perishing as they!

I may not see them growing
In the wood or in the glenI may not tread upon the green
And fragrant earth again:
Yet leave the essement more

Yet leave the easement open.
That the blue and blessed sly
The tree-tops and the pleasant his
May greet my clusing eye! But gather ye around me-The friends whom I bareler The triends whom a parent.
The eyes that ever shone with min
The ficarts that I have proved,—

In calm unweeping sorrow—
O! let the lov'd drawner;
And let each low familiar tone
Fall on my dying ear. I know that death is near me, And yet I fear it not: The shadows of my lot-

The welcome of the spirite.

Of the pure and sin-forgires.

The lifting of the curtain-fold.
